

Day 54, Page 1
February 2, 2023
Ushuaia, Argentina

This morning was beautiful, the sun was out and only a few clouds. It was about 50 degrees in the sun but much colder in the shade. I took this picture from the fan tail of the ship of Ushuaia in the distance, about 10:00 a.m. If I was sleeping and someone transported me here and when I woke up they ask where was I, I would have guessed Alaska. It feels just like Alaska, the colors, the mountains, the snow the only difference they speak Spanish.

The Theatre show tonight was: Born To Rock
An iconic show with the best rock songs ever.

The reason the sea was so calm is because we were headed through the Strait of Magellan, avoiding Cape Horn to get to Ushuaia.

Cape Horn

Headland in Chile

Cape Horn is a rocky headland on Hornos Island, in southern Chile's Tierra del Fuego archipelago. It's surrounded by wild seas off the southern tip of South America where the Pacific and Atlantic oceans meet. The albatross-shaped Cape Horn Monument commemorates the lives of thousands of seafarers who perished attempting to sail around the cape. A secluded lighthouse and the tiny Stella-Maris Chapel are nearby. — Google
