Milford Sound

Milford Sound extends southwest for approximately 9 miles. Although comparatively small, Milford Sound is the most remarkable of the Sounds, the mountains which surround it being higher than any in the vicinity of the other Sounds.

Milford Sound is not a Sound it's actually a fjord. it was named so in recognition of its geographic features. This large ocean inlet is a bit bigger than a bay and is flanked by sheer rock faces and majestic peaks. However, Sounds are formed when a river valley is flooded with the sea, whereas Milford Sound is carved out by an erosion of ancient glacial ice. Milford Sound, also known as Piopiotahi, is an inlet of the Tasman Sea in the southwest of New Zealand's South Island and it is situated within Fjordland National Park. The Maori named the fjord Piopiotahi after the thrush-like piopio bird, now extinct.

It was a rainy day and there were hundreds if not thousands of waterfalls, a beautiful sight.
