Gardens by the Bay is a large waterfront garden complex that's home to exotic plants from every continent except Antarctica. The complex features two cooled conservatories, one of which is the world's largest column less glass house. There are also several "Super tree" vertical gardens reaching up to 160 feet in height that contain a diverse range of vines, orchids and other plant life.

Merlion Park: you can see the two famous Merlion statues - the "cub" and its "parent" statue - that are icons of Singapore. The statue park offers a great view of Singapore's BD and Marina Bay

After leaving the ship we rented a taxi for 2 hours to tour the city. We also went to Sentosa Island which is Singapore's premier resort and recreation area, with everything from pristine tropical beaches to a Universal Studios theme park.

Singapore is a great port of call when you're travelling.

Each of the original ethnic enclaves of Singapore boasts a fair amount of period architecture in the form of neatly restored shophouses, and retains its own distinct flavour: Little India has its garland-sellers and curry houses, Chinatown its calligraphers and fortune-tellers, while Arab Street is home to cluttered stores selling fine cloths and curios. Right at the core of downtown Singapore are historic public buildings and the lofty cathedral of the Colonial District.

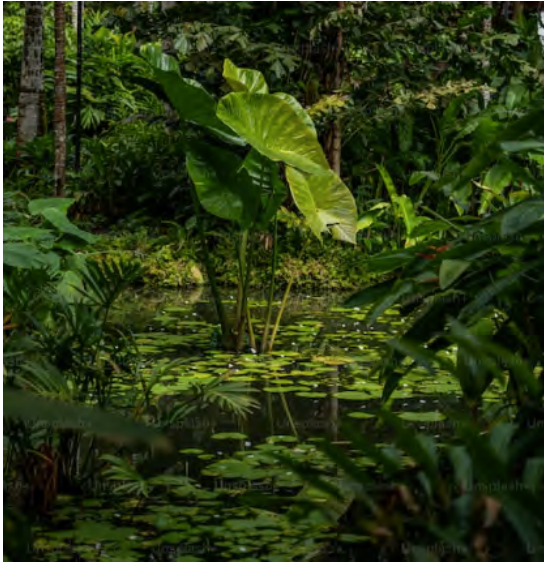

Old Singapore is looking better than ever thanks to belated conservation work, and that historical emphasis carries over into a clutch of fine museums – including the National Museum, recounting Singapore's story from the fourteenth century onwards; the Chinatown Heritage Centre, evoking the harsh conditions endured by Chinatown's earlier inhabitants; and the Peranakan Museum and Baba House, which celebrate Singapore's Baba-Nonya heritage, just as important as that of Melaka and Penang.
